

2010 JSR Student Award Winner // Michael T. Brown

The JSR Foundation is proud to announce Michael T. Brown as the 2010 JSR Student Award Winner. From numerous entries Michael's submittal, Agricultural Intervention, best aligned with the ideals of the JSR Foundation. Michael's study focused on reintroducing agricultural practices to the Denargo Market area, located just north of Downtown Denver. Sustainably developing residential units, commercial uses, and improved connections to the surrounding community, all while integrating urban agricultural practices makes Michael's project a tremendous study in a new direction for urban renewal projects.

Growing up in the suburbs of Chicago, Michael began to develop an appreciation for graphic design leading him to Iowa State University. At Iowa State he was introduced to Landscape Architecture, eventually leading him to the Landscape Architecture program at Colorado State University. Michael's professional goals are to bring interactive design elements into the urban fabric as well as promote agricultural, bicycle, and pedestrian practices in urban contexts. Since receiving his Bachelor's of Science in Landscape Architecture from Colorado State University, Michael has provided design and project coordination services to rural and underserved communities in Eastern Colorado through the Department of Local Affairs.
